

The DCC used to publish how many COAs were being done monthly and how many licenses were being issued weekly. Why did that stop?

It would inform us if there's even enough business to go around. If not then the DCC should be limiting licenses and putting their resources into spot testing products on shelves that look suspect. If they find a discrepancy go to that lab and have them run the test in front of you.

Labs should be given subsidies if you want us to survive this race to the bottom currently. Labs are afraid to fail products because word would get out quickly and they'd have no business, and prices customers are willing to pay is unsustainable.
